Redefining Public Sector Spaces

Reception spaces. Private offices. Meeting and training areas. These traditional business environments contribute to a larger tapestry that make up productive, efficient workplaces. But how do they look, feel, and operate within government organizations?

Municipal spaces have evolved tremendously over the last several decades. Today, we're exploring these public sector landscapes on a deeper level—the needs of employees, the community, and the demands of specific organizations are essential. Although there are a variety of public sector organizations necessary to the safety and success of cities and counties across the country, the furniture solutions that reside in those locales may not look the same. It all comes down to reexamining who is using these environments and how to support their goals with solutions and spaces that exceed the status quo.

From structured, systematic fire stations to warm, welcoming city administrative offices, HON is primed and ready to galvanize a plan of action for government spaces in your community and beyond. Guided by timeless values and a commitment to service, we are your go-to resource for energized spaces and powerhouse solutions designed to make a difference.

Welcome & Reception Spaces

Serious work takes place in public sector spaces, but that doesn't mean their reception areas should be intimidating. Warm, welcoming first impressions think soft, supportive seating, accommodating surfaces, and elegant fabrics foster trust and familiarity when it matters the most.

"The latest research shows: when government agencies offer a better customer experience, they deliver measurable impact across multiple priorities."

– McKinsey & Company

Private Office Spaces

Discretion and functionality are two of the most important attributes of a private government office. These environments deserve solutions designed for fine-tuned focus, comprehensive organization, and collaborative capabilities. With intuitive, innovative task seating and multipurpose storage and surfaces, any personal environment in a public sector space can be at its productive peak.

"There are incredible efficiency gains when you are actually designing for the jobs that people are doing, as opposed to designing for a list of requirements."

– Marcy Jacobs, associate partner for McKinsey & Company

Administration & Office Spaces

Public administration and shared office environments demand a diplomatic balance of individual discretion and collaborative open areas. With a cohesive blend of privacy screens, quick-sit task chairs, and multipurpose storage, government administrative spaces can stay focused without sacrificing connection.

"For those employees who are in the office, the goal is to provide comfort and safety at every level and to make employees feel relaxed, as if they were at home."

– Parterre

Meeting Spaces

Whether it's a policy-making mission or an impromptu brainstorming session, sensible shared environments should always encourage dynamic discussions. From seating that stays supportive and comfortable throughout the day to powered-up surfaces that keep the team engaged, cultivating connection in public sector meeting spaces is easier than ever.

"Flexibility around how, where, and when people work is no longer a differentiator, it's now table stakes. In the U.S., employees expect flexibility within their job as much as they expect a 401(k)."

— Harvard Business Review

Training Spaces

Agile environments are essential for developing and preparing tomorrow's leaders for what's to come. From new firefighters to ambitious government interns, HON is an industry leader when it comes to flexible spaces designed to teach, innovate, and launch big ideas.

"Decision makers have recognized the need and opportunity to outfit their operations with training facilities, also understanding how these facilities can foster collaboration among neighboring departments and support recruitment of interested, young candidates."

– Bergstrom, B & Frank, T. (n.d.).

Collaborative Spaces

Privacy is always conducive to individual focus, but teamwork is the foundation of any successful organization. Whether it's a training space for new police cadets or a meeting room for city planners, collaborative environments that foster synergistic communication help set the stage for lasting connections and efficient productivity.

"Employers will need to offer a diversity of working setups that range from dynamic spaces that foster collaborative creativity and breakout areas where small groups can gather to."

— Inger Bartlett

Breakroom Spaces

Whether you're sharing coffee with a co-worker or just having some introspective peace and quiet, busy people want and deserve breathable, tranquil environments designed around solutions that administer comfort and clarity.

"Just like athletes use locker rooms and the sidelines to recover between plays, people need space to reset their minds between meetings. Dedicated relaxation areas near conference rooms—perhaps even tech-free zones—will give employees a place to take a break."

— JLL
